No Occasion for Fear in This District Over Mexican Crisis

Under instructions from the sheriff's office, deputies are quietly moving about through the county, taking arms and ammunition from suspicious-looking Mexicans, and otherwise taking precautions to prevent any possible outbreak by Villa sympathizers in Santa Cruz county, as a result of the decision of the war department of the United States to send a punitive expedition into Mexico to capture or exterminate the bandit force under Villa which at at the mine, a few miles north of Pattacked and pillaged Columbus, N. In Patagonia everything is quiet, so far as the Mexican situation is concerned. Although the town is without a peace officer, it is known the sheriff has several deputies without regular pay in this community, and it is believed they have been given instructions to be on guard to prevent any threatened race trouble.

Experts From State Bureau of Mines to Give Demonstration

Secretary Bristol of the Nogales Chamber of Commerce writes that the special miners' meeting of the Chamber held in Nogales last week was a splendid success, but it was not as largely attended from Patagonia as desired. The people of this district appreciate what the Chamber of Commerce is trying to do for the mining industry of the county, and futute meetings of this character will be attended by more people from this community.

The State Bureau of Mines offers to give a demonstration on oil flotation and have suggested that they send down an outfit and expert to give the demonstration at Nogales. It seems that to benefit the most people, this demonstration should be held at Patagonia, to-A demonstration of the oil flotation process would be of great interest to mining men of the Patagonia country, susceptible to this treatment. Such a meeting, properly advertised, would be sure of a large attendance, and should result in much benefit to owners of mining property. The proposition will be taken up here with a view to having the meeting in Patagonia, as it is the logical place for any such demonstration in this county.

Secretary Bristol calls attention to the desire of the Nogales Chamber of Commerce to maintain in its quarters a comprehensive mineral exhibit, not just a conglomerate collection of ore specimerry-go-round and other carnival fea- ore specimens will then be placed on the map to mark the location of mines Judge M. PUZZLE TO SCIENTIFIC MEN Most Advanced of Specialists Concede

They Know Little of the Vagaries of the Brain.

A French sergeant who was wounded in the head in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 had abnormal times, which lasted about thirty hours, during which he felt and smelt nothing, although his appetite was normal. During these abnormal periods certain experiments were made with him, and one of these was the writing of an unseen letter, the writer's hand being hidden by a special screen.

Ten sheets of paper were placed under his hand, and he would commence to write. As he wrote, the sheets would be removed one by one, until only the signature would appear on he last. That is to say, he would have written one page of writing on ten sheets. Then he would be asked to read his letter from the last sheet, blank with the exception of the signatura This he would do without missing a word, making corrections where necessary, and putting punctuation marks exactly in the right place as measured by the other sheets.

There is the case of a Scottish lawyer, who, having a perplexing case in hand, was observed by his wife to get up one night, go to a writing desk in the bedroom, alt down and write for a considerable time. Having carefully folded his document, he then opened his desk, put it away and came back to bed.

Next morning he related a dream to his wife, in the course of which he had given an excellent expert opinion on the case at issue, no single point of which he could recall. Judge of his surprise when his wife led him to his desk, told him where to look, and diected him to his own dream document, where he found the whole matter clearly written out and the whole case satisfactory.

WAYS OF TACTFUL NURSE

Many Things That Should Be Observed by Those Who Would Minister to the Sick.

The best training in the world can not turn a woman who has not the gift for nursing into a tactful nurse. Efficient and dependable she may trained to be, but tact and sympathy must come by insight. However, there are certain rules and certain little niceties that anyone trained or untrained can and should remember when they are in the sick room.

Be careful that you have no annoying little tricks, such as clearing your throat, humming, rocking, drumming with your fingers or making any unnecessary noise that might be irritating to tired nerves. As most people who have such tricks are quite unconscious of them themselves, it is quite necessary to stop and think occasionally to be sure that you are guilty of none of them.

Another habit most annoying to tients is one that many nurses have of talking to other people, the doctor or family, in an undertone or whisper within hearing of the patient. This is as unnecessary and discourteous to an ill person as it is to a well person, and to many patients it is alarming as well. If you have anything to say that cannot be said in the hearing of the patient, go out of the room to

A still more necessary point to remember is that the most exquisite neatness must be the order of the sick room. The slightest disorder is often intolerable to a nervous patient. Remember that all the patient would wish to have done in her room you must do for her, otherwise she will worry about it. If she is an habitual person and accustomed to have her furniture and personal belongings just so, it will fret and worry her to have them misplaced. Do not leave medicine bottles, bandages or any Dickens. "Holy Willie's Prayer" is paraphernalia of the sick room in sight. They are depressing as well as ugly.

Do not insist upon straightening the Bumble and Uriah Heep. bedclothes if your patient wishes to be let alone. Do not insist on anything that is unnecessary in the way of attentions or regulations. Above all, hold it always in your mind that you must study and consider your patient's personality and subdue your own. Do not thoughtlessly impose your will and habits upon a helpless, nervous invalid.

Not Always What They Seem. "Tony," said a British officer to his soldier-servant, "something tells me that I shall never come back alive. I seem to have a presentiment that way." "Then take no heed of it, sir," responded the servant. "Them presentiments is frauds. 'A cousin of mine had one once, and it treated him very badly. It was just like the one that's troublin' you now, sir. He felt sure that he'd be killed out in Egypt, so he divided his savings between his sweetheart and his bosom chum, and went out to be shot. But never a scratch did he get."

"And what happened when he returned home? Did they give him back his money?"

"Not a farden, sir. They'd been and got married while he was away, and they'd set up housekeeping with the money.'

Carlyle, With His Usual Astuteness, Recognized Qualities of Dickens at Quite an Early Stage.

Charles Dickens dealt not with subtleties of character, but with broad human emotions. His good people were all very good and his bad people were all unmitigatedly bad-a set of affairs almost unknown in real life. In short, he was a dramatist; his figures stood for something, they were an impersonation of ideas and mo-

Carlyle, with his usual astuteness, recognized it at quite an early stage of Dickens' popularity.

"I had to go yesterday to Dickens' reading at the Hanover rooms," he writes, "to the complete upsetting of my evening habitudes and spiritual composure. Women's Feet Cubist Landscapes.

Once-ages ago, so long that scarce ly anyone remembers it (about three months, I should think it was)-shoes differed in size and in state of preservation, but their colors were black or them up the front or buttoning them up the side. The formula of unification-universal sympathy with man-embodied in wit and humor and pathos, in satire's scorching flame, in cheerful sunshine of didactic optimism, supplies the key to manifold analogies in Burns and the ne plus ultra in the satire of hypocrisy; and the false elder in Burns is of the kith and kin of Pecksniff and

If there was one thing more than another that he prided himself on, it was the fit of his clothes.

"I can never get a dress coat really to fit," he said to his partner, as he glanced down at a perfectly made garment, with a hope, of course, that she would at once disclaim the insinuation. "Look at this thing."

"Well, it is atrocious," she said coolly. "But why not save your money and buy one? It is so much cheaper in the long run than hiring."

He dines with the Marquise d'Esclignac and meets Miss Junames it Pitchoune. He dines with the Marquise d'Esclignac and meets Miss Julia Redmond, American heiress. He is ordered to Algiers but is not allowed to take servants or dogs. Miss Redmond takes care of Pitchoune, who, longing for his master, runs away from her. The marquise plans to marry Julia to the Duc de Tremont. Pitchoune follows Sabron to Algiers, dog and master meet, and Sabron gets permission to keep his dog with him. The Duc de Tremont finds the American heiress capricious. Sabron, wounded in an engagement, falls into the dry bed of a river and is watched over by Pitchoune. After a horrible night and day Pitchoune leaves him. Tremont takes Julia and the marquise to Algiers in his yacht but has doubts about Julia's Red Cross mission. After long search Julia gets trace of Sabron's whereabouts. Julia for the moment turns matchmaker in behalf of Tremont. Hammet Abou tells the Marquise where he thinks Sabron may be found. Tremont decides to go with Hammet Abou to find Sabron.

She saw her predicament, but she was a subtle Oriental. Victory had been in her camp and in her village; her sons and grandsons had never been vanquished. Perhaps the dying man in the but would bring the Evil Eye! He was dying, anyway-he would not live twenty-four hours. She knew this, for her ninety years of life had seen many eyes close on the oasis under the hard blue skies

To the taller of the two Bedouins she said in Arabic:

"Fatou Anni is nearly one hundred years old. She has borne twenty children, she has had fifty grandchildren; she has seen many wives, many brides and many mothers. She does not believe the sick man has the Evil Eye. She is not afraid of your fifty armed men. Fatou Anni is not afraid. Allah is great. She will not give up the Frenchman because of fear, nor will she give him up to any man. She gives him to the women of his people.

With dignity and majesty and with great beauty of carriage, the old woman turned and walked toward her hut and the Bedouins followed her.

CHAPTER XXII.

Into the Desert.

A week after the caravan of the Duc de Tremont left Algiers, Julia Redmond came unexpectedly to the villa of Madame de la Maine at an early morning hour. Madame de la Maine saw her standing on the threshold of her bedr om door.

"Chere Madame," Julia said, "I am leaving today with a dragoman and twenty servants to go into the desert." Madame de la Maine was still in bed. At nine o'clock she read her papers and her correspondence. "Into the desert-alone!"

Julia, with her cravache in her gloved hands, smiled sweetly though she was very pale. "I had not thought of going alone, Madame," she replied with charming assurance, "I knew you would go with me."

On a chair by her bed was a wrapper of blue silk and lace. The comtesse sprang up and then thrust her feet into her slippers and stared at Julia.

"What do you want with me?" she "What are you going to do in the desert?" "Watch!"

"Yes, yes!" nodded Madame de la "And your aunt?"

"Deep in a bazaar for the hospital," miled Miss Redmond. Madame de la Maine regarded her slender friend with admiration and envy. "Why hadn't I thought of it?" She rang for her maid. "Because your great-grandfather was not a ploneer!" Miss Redmond answered. The sun which, all day long, held the desert in its burning embrace, went westward in his own brilliant caravan "The desert blossoms like a rose,

Therese.' "Like a rose?" questioned Madame de la Maine.

She was sitting in the door of her tent; her white dress and her white waste.

hat gleamed like a touch of snow upon the desert's face. Julia Redmond, on a rug at her feet, and in her khaki riding-habit the color of the sand, blended with the desert as though part of it. She sat up as she spoke.

"How divine! See!" She pointed to the stretches of the Sahara before her. On every side they spread away as far as the eye could reach, suave, mellow, black, undulating finally to small hillocks with corrugated sides. as a group of little sandhills rose softly out of the sealike plain. "Look, Therese!"

Slowly, from other and gold the color changed; a faint wavelike blush crept over the sands, which reddened paled, faded, warmed again, took depth and grew intense like flame.

"The beart of a rose! N'est-ce pas, Therese?"

"I understand now what you mean," matter very little to any one but our all exports.

selves. She had been taught to go lightly, to avoid serious things. Her great-grandmother had gone lightly to the scaffold, exquisitely courteous till the last.

"I ask your pardon if I jostled you in the tumbrel," the old comtesse had said to her companion on the way to the guillotine. "The springs of the eart are poor"-and she went up smiling.

In the companionship of the American girl, Therese de la Maine had thrown off restraint. If the Marquise d'Esclignac had felt Julia's influence, Therese de la Maine, being near her own age, echoed Julia's very feeling.

Except for their dragoman and their servants, the two women were alone in the desert.

Smiling at Julia, Madame de la Maine said: "I haven't been so far from the Rue de la Paix in my life." "How can you speak of the Rue de la Paix, Therese?"

"Only to show you how completely I have left it behind." Julia's eyes were fixed upon the limitless sands, a sea where a faint line lost itself in the red west and the hortzon shut from her sight everything that she believed to be her life.

This is the seventh day, Therese!" "Already you are as brown as an Arab, Julia!"

"Robert does not like dark women," said the Comtesse de la Maine, and rubbed her cheek. "I must wear two "Look, Therese!"

"You as well, ma chere amie!"

Across the face of the desert the glow began to withdraw its curtain. The sands suffused an ineffable hue, a shell-like pink took possession, and the desert melted and then grew colder-it waned before their eyes, withered like a tea-rose.

"Like a rose!" Julia murmured, smell its perfume!" She lifted her head, drinking in with delight the fragrance of the sands.

"Ma chere Julia," gently protested the comtesse, lifting her head, "per-fume, Julia!" But she breathed with her friend, while a sweetly subtle, intoxicating odor, as of millions and millions of roses, gathered, warmed, kept, then scattered on the airs of heaven, intoxicating her.

To the left were the huddled tents of their attendants. No sooner had the sun gone down than the Arabs commenced to sing-a song that Julia had especially liked:

Love is like a sweet perfume, It comes and it escapes.

When it's present, it intoxicates;
When it's a memory, it brings tears.
Love is like a sweet breath,
It comes and it escapes. The weird music filled the silence of the silent place. It had the evanescent quality of the wind that brought the breath of the sand-flowers. The voices of the Arabs, not unmusical, though hoarse and appealing, cried out their love-song, and then the music turned to invocation and to prayer.

The two women listened silently as the night fell, their figures sharply outlined in the beautiful clarity of the eastern night.

Julia stood upright. In her re sre riding dress, she was as slender as a boy. She remained looking toward the horizon, immovable, patient, a silent watcher over the uncommunicative

"Perhaps," she thought, "there is nothing really beyond that line, so fast blotting itself into night-and yet I eem to see them come!

Madame de la Maine, in the door of her tent, immovable, her hands clasped around her knees, look affectionately at the young girl before her. Julia was a delight to her. She was carried away by her, by her frank simplicity, and drawn to her warm and generous heart. Madame de la Maine had her own story. She wondered whether ever, for any period of her conventional life, she could have thrown everything aside and stood out with the man she loved. Julia, standing before her, a dark slim figure in the night-isolated and alone-recalled the figurehead of a ship, its face toward heaven, pioneering the open seas.

Julia watched, indeed. On the desert there is the brilliant day, a passionate glow, and the nightfall. They passed the nights sometimes listening for a cry that should hail an approaching carayan, sometimes hearing the wild cry of the hyenas, or of a passing vulture on his horrid flight. Otherwise, until the camp stirred with the dawn and the early prayer-call sounded "Alinh! Allah! Akbar!" into the stillness, they were wrapped in complete slience.

Meaning of Yankee. There are several conflicting theories regarding the origin of the word Yankee. The most probable is that it came from a corrupt pronunciation by the Indians of the word English, or its French from Anglaia. The term Yankee was originally applied only to the natives of the New England states but foreigners have extended it to all the natives of the United States and during the American Civil war the southerners used it as a term of reproach for all the inhabitants of the North.

Early Home of President of the United States.

North Bend, Ohlo, Is Known In His tory as Having Contained the Residence of Gen. William Henry Harrison.

The home of Gen. William Henry Harrison, at North Bend, which he maintained all through the years of his public services, and to which he retired when in private life, was really in part a log cabin. One who was a guest there in 1846 describes it as a long, rambling structure, part two stories in height, but mostly with one story, with the wide front facing the Ohio river, from which it stood back about three hundred yards.

There were nine rooms in all on the ground floor, says the Columbus Dispatch, and one of these-a large onewas the log portion," it evidently having been originally a log cabin standing by itself, but the owner had built additions to it as need was felt and means permitted, until he had quite a pretentious country residence. The whole of the exterior had been covered with clapboards-sawed boards being too expensive in those daysand the clapboards were painted white. Seen from the river at the bend, it is said to have presented a very beautiful aspect, the white building in its setting of green in summer being particularly striking.

In this log cabin portion of his resiience General Harrison often entertained companies of friends, and cider was the beverage used at these dinners. This hospitality was famous just prior to the presidential campaign in which he led the Whigs, and the contest became known in political circles as the log cabin and hard cider campaign. After the death of President Harrison, Mrs. Harrison returned to the old home at North Bend, and there spent the rest of her life. General Harrison owned a large farm, and it. was managed by his son-in-law, W. H.

Mrs. Harrison, who was a daughter of Judge J. C. Symmes and was born in New Jersey, lived to be eighty-nine years old, her death occurring in 1864, near the close of the Civil war. Her body lies buried beside that of her distinguished husband in the soil of the old farm, where in all probability a suitable monument will soon be erected by the joint efforts of the nation and the state of Ohio.

MAKING THE BEST OF BEANS Mother

Way That They Were Prepared a Generation Ago Will Be Found Hard to Improve Upon.

In the Woman's Home Companion the cookery editor devotes a page to good old-fashioned dishes. A dozen recipes are given for dishes that were popular a generation ago. The editor says that these dishes are not on the tables of the housekeepers of today chiefly because carefully written rules for their preparation are seldom found. Following is a recipe given for Boston baked beans:

"Pick over three cupfuls of pea beans, cover with cold water and soak for several hours. Drain, put in stewpan, cover with fresh water, heat Bruises, Sprains, gradually to the boiling point and let simmer until skins will burst, which is hest determined by taking a few beans on the tip of a spoon and blowing on them, when skins will burst if sufficiently cooked. Drain beans. Scrape a three-fourths-pound piece of fat salt pork, remove a one-fourth-inch slice, and put in bottom of bean pot. Cut through rind of remaining pork at onehalf-inch distances. Put beans in pot and bury pork in beans, leaving the rind exposed. Mix one tablespoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of sugar and two tablespoonfuls of molasses. Add one cupful of boiling water and pour mixture over beans; then add enough boiling water to cover beans. Bake in a slow oven eight hours, uncovering the last hour of the cooking that the rind may become brown. Add more bolling water as needed."

RULES OF THE HOUSEHOLD

One Woman Writes Out What She Wants Done and Thereby Gets Results.

"The reason that we, as homemakers, are obliged to put up with unskilled and inefficient assistance is because we do not do our share in training the raw material," said Mrs. Good Housewife with some emphasis. "Suppose the great factories where emigrant labor is employed should be run on the system which prevails in so many homes? Suppose the employer should say, 'Oh, dear, I just hate to train a green hand! It takes so much time, and is such a bother!'

The Defective Baby.

At a time when politicians and generals have to decide almost every day whether to purchase a trench or a hill at the cost of so many human lives, the death of a helpless baby has set a whole nation talking. This happens to be a nation which cannot boast that it cares supremely about its babies, for hundreds of thousands of them die every year of preventable causes. They die of tenements which could be ventilated, of milk that could be remedied. They die because their fathers are underpaid, because their mothers are overworked; they are run over on city streets because there are insufficient playgrounds; they are infected by dirt diseases; they are starved. Given a chance in life most of them would become happy and useful. They are refused that chance because public opinion is too indolent, because many landlords and business men are too greedy, because politicians are cowardly and ignorant. Every year hordes of fine human beings are condemned to death because it costs too much to save them. But idiot has become a moral issue

GIVE HARNESS BEST OF CARE

When Placed Just Behind Work Team Leather Becomes Brittle and Sometimes Breaks Very Easily.

Many farmers hang their harness in the barn just behind the work team so that it will be handy when wanted. Of course it is convenient and can be thrown onto the backs of the norses in a few minutes, but there is a considerable loss in hanging the harness at the back end of the stall.

There is a constant passing off of ammonia from the manure behind the harness and this has a bad effect on the leather of the harness. This is the reason why a harness that is allowed to hang in stalls cracks and Safeguarding One's Habitation is indries out, becomes brittle and sometimes breaks very easily. One would have to keep the leather thoroughly soaked with oil to prevent injury from the action of the ammonia.

Then there is danger of harness bethe horses from the lot into the stalls. When it is thrown down and tramped into the manure it is filthy to handle and is injured by the action of the damp manure. The best plan is to have a room in the barn in which to hang the harness, it is even better to hang it in the hallway than over the manure. The room need not be large. Everything in it may easily be kept in proper order, and all repair material should also be located here. This room should be free from mice and rats, for these rodents are destructive finitely Better Than Making Repairs After the Catastrophe Is a Matter of Record.

PREVENTION OF FIRES

SIMPLE RULES WORTH KEEPING IN THE MEMORY.

One of the first rules for fire prevention in the home is, "Do not allow chiling thrown down into the manure of dren to play with matches." You the stable by the constant passing of should organize your home on the same plan as that of a factory. For instance, the man of the house should have charge of the power and maintenance department, and occasionally should inspect his home from the cellar to the garret, with the idea of fire prevention in mind.

> Don't throw ashes from cigars, cigarettes and pipes down the air shafts or registers. No one should throw burned or burning "natches and tobacco on the floor.

One can easily start a fire when trying to find something in a dark closet, bedroom or cellar, using matches or candles to light the way.

How many times have we seen one use naphtha, benzine or kerosene in stoves and furnaces in an endeavor to light or quicken fires? An explosion may result in death.

The Metal That Doesn't Fluctuate With all the excitement due to the high price of copper, the high price of tungsten and the other metals, and the consequent search, development and operations of mines of these metals, the public seems to have lost sight of the one metal that never goes up and never goes down-gold, is the statement recently made by the Arizona State Bureau of Mines. The present movement looking to a stimulation of trade with South American countries finds among its leading obstacles the difficulty of extending the long time credit to which these countries are accustomed. It demonstrates the need of more money so that our commerce may benefit by these immense fields of trade which are practically abandoned by foreign merchants who have heretofore supplied their needs.

Given a good gold supply upon which to base the extended credit, trade with the South American countries, upon a large scale, is assured to the United States, but without a large gold supply the credit cannot be extended.

With the restoration of peace in Europe will come an enormous demand for capital with which to restore its industrial enterprises, while our own growing industrial demands and the need for financing foreign trade will greatly increase the demand for gold.

In our rush for the immediate dollar we are forgetting the future-we are Office at Phoenix, Ariz., Feby. 14, forgetting that the increased supply of
